A useful, if terse, pottery report for a site in an area of the Weald where very little Roman pottery has been published. It would, however, have benefited from more pottery illustrations and publication of assemblages.

M Lyne 1994: Late Roman Handmade Wares in South-East Britain, Unpubl PhD thesis, University of Reading.

Although this thesis covers a much larger area than Sussex, it identifies and discusses various variants of Late Roman East Sussex Ware with dated corpora of forms and describes changes in pottery supply within Sussex between c.AD.200 and 400+.

M Lyne 1995: 'The Hassocks cemetery', Sussex Archaeological Collections 132, 1995, 53-85.

A bringing together of all of the surviving artefacts and records relating to various unpublished and inadequately published excavations in and around the Hassocks Roman cemetery between the Late 19th c. and c.1970. Eleven grave groups and 118 other pottery illustrations give a good picture of what was being supplied to the small town at Hassocks between the 1st and 4th centuries. The decorated samian is identified by Joanna Bird. Finds split between Barbican House, Lewes, Brighton Museum and Marlipins, Shoreham.

The pottery from this site includes a very large ditch fill assemblage of Late 4th-to-Early 5th c. date, which, apart from including large numbers of sherds from both closed and open forms in Overwey/Portchester D fabric, also has the lower part of an Early Saxon cooking-pot. This site is very important for the understanding of the transition from Late Roman to Early Saxon East Sussex. 20 vess.

M Lyne 2003: 'Pottery sequence (Phases 2 to 4)', in Lovell 2003, 34.

This report, together with Laidlaw 2003, is of considerable importance in indicating that there were Late C1¹-to-EC2 century kilns on the Sussex coastal plain producing coarsewares in the Hardham and Wiggonholt tradition. This has led to my renaming the Hardham industry Arun Valley. Finds in Littlehampton museum. 37 vess. Site Greywares, other grey, grog-t, flint-t, brit fine, import fine. Jars, b, d, lids.
